Executive Summary

A PayPal invoice shows clients a business contact block, and that block is a different object from the private data PayPal holds for identity checks. PayPal's Canadian help page says business information "appears at the top of your invoices and estimates" and can include a logo, business name, business address, website and other contact details (www.paypal.com). The same page gives a two-step update order: change the address, email or phone in the PayPal profile first, then return to Invoicing and update the business information shown on invoices (www.paypal.com). Identity confirmation is a separate process that PayPal describes as a regulatory step covering name, address and date of birth, or company information (www.paypal.com).

For a Montreal freelancer, the practical decision is which truthful address clients should see. Documentation as of 26 November 2026 does not say that a home address will or will not appear on a given invoice, so this report treats that as unknown until previewed. It also does not claim any test was run on a live PayPal account; every product statement below is attributed to opened public documentation. Three points remain unresolved: whether saved templates pick up a changed profile address, whether address display is optional on a given invoice type, and what an address change does to account review.

A professional mail-service or office address can be a legitimate choice for the client-facing block only if it is truthful and the owner is entitled to use it. It does not replace the owner's residence in the Quebec enterprise register, where a natural person must declare a domicile address and may declare a separate professional address, defined as the main place of work or business (www.quebec.ca). It also does not remove tax-document duties: Revenu Québec states that no special invoice format is imposed, yet a registrant's supporting documents must carry specified information that varies across three value bands, under $100, $100 to $499.99 and $500 or more (www.revenuquebec.ca). The table lists the supplier's name, not an address (www.revenuquebec.ca).

Quebec's Charter of the French language adds a language duty for invoices, which must be drawn up in French (www.legisquebec.gouv.qc.ca). PayPal states it does not warrant that its invoices meet local legal requirements and that the seller must include all required information (www.paypal.com).

The report's contribution is an audit workflow: inventory each address field, update in the documented order, preview an invoice and an estimate, inspect each saved template on desktop and mobile, record the result, and ask PayPal in writing when documentation is silent. No volume, ranking or savings figure is claimed.

Introduction and Background

Montreal service freelancers and small agencies often start invoicing from a kitchen table. The account was opened with a home address, the first invoice was sent months later, and nobody checked what the client saw. This report follows one address through PayPal's documented surfaces and separates three things that are easy to confuse: the address a seller chooses to display, the address the law or a regulator requires the seller to declare or document, and the address PayPal holds privately to confirm who the account holder is.

The audience is a freelancer or small agency that already has a Canadian PayPal Business account and already invoices clients. This is therefore a customer-view audit after onboarding. It does not cover account eligibility or identity verification, which PayPal governs through its Canadian User Agreement (last updated 10 June 2026 on the retrieved page) (www.paypal.com). That agreement says individuals must be residents of Canada and a business must be "organized in, operating in, or a resident of, Canada" (www.paypal.com).

This report covers how the invoice business address is set, whether a home address shows, how to change it, and what a Quebec invoice must contain. PayPal's French-language help was not reviewed separately; the English help page was the one served under the French slug.

The three roles are distinguished throughout:

- Display: the contact block a seller chooses to show clients on invoices and estimates.
- Local duty: what Quebec and federal tax and language rules require a document to say.
- Private verification: what PayPal holds to confirm who owns the account.

Two limits frame everything that follows. First, PayPal notes that product and feature availability may differ by market, so a screenshot from another country's help page is not evidence for a Canadian account. Second, no account was operated for this research. Where documentation is silent, the report says so and prescribes a preview step instead of guessing.

A word on the publisher: 2727coworking.com is a Montreal provider of desks, private offices, meeting rooms, virtual offices and business addresses, so it is one possible source of a professional address. Disclosure: this article is published by 2727coworking.com, and it is the only commercial mention in the article. The factual claims here are sourced to regulators, statutes, vendor help pages and statistical agencies, not to the publisher.

Three Address Roles: Display, Local Duty and Private Verification

Voluntary contact display

The block clients see on a PayPal invoice is configured by the seller. PayPal's developer documentation describes the invoicer object as "the invoicer business information that appears on the invoice" (developer.paypal.com). In that schema the business address is marked optional, and the phone number can be hidden by the invoicer (developer.paypal.com). The documentation also notes that the first address line is needed for data entry and for compliance and risk checks (developer.paypal.com), which is a reminder that one field can serve two purposes in PayPal's systems even when the invoice only displays part of it.

This is developer documentation, not the web interface, so it frames questions rather than promising behavior.

Local document duties

The second role belongs to law, not to PayPal. PayPal says it does not represent or warrant that its invoices meet local legal or regulatory requirements, and that it is the seller's responsibility to include required information. The terms and conditions text box can carry legally required information such as tax details. The duties attach to what the document says, not to which PayPal screen produced it; later sections set out the Quebec ones.

Private verification data

The third role is private. PayPal's identity page says it confirms personal information (name, address, date of birth) or company information for regulatory reasons, first through national databases and then through uploaded documents. The proof-of-address list on that page concerns personal records such as utility bills. It is not a list of acceptable client-facing business addresses, and it says nothing about how an address appears on an invoice. If identity confirmation is not completed, PayPal says some functionality on the account could be limited.

The User Agreement adds two duties that matter for any address change. The account holder must keep mailing address, email address and other contact information current in the profile (www.paypal.com), and the agreement lists providing false, inaccurate or misleading information among prohibited conduct. Together they set the boundary for this article: never alter private identity facts to change what clients see, and never put information on an invoice that is untrue.

Table 1 below maps each address role to the PayPal surface where it appears, who can see it according to documentation, and the step that verifies it.

Table 1. Address role by PayPal setting, visibility, source and verification step (documentation retrieved 26 November 2026)

Address role	PayPal setting or surface	Private, client-visible or unknown	Source	Verification step
Account profile street address	Settings page, Addresses section; app: Account info, Addresses	Account data, not described as client-visible; but the help page says new invoice contact details must first be added here (www.paypal.com)	PayPal address and invoicing help	Record every address listed; note which is marked primary
Identity-confirmation address	Customer Identification Process (CIP)	Private; documents are personal records	PayPal CIP help	Do not edit to change client-facing output
Invoice business information	Invoicing settings, business information	Client-visible: appears at the top of invoices and estimates	PayPal invoicing help	Preview a new invoice and a new estimate

Address role	PayPal setting or surface	Private, client-visible or unknown	Source	Verification step
Saved invoice templates	Invoicing settings, templates	Unknown for inheritance; templates can store business information	PayPal help and developer docs (developer.paypal.com)	Open each template and compare its displayed block
Estimates	Estimate creation and templates	Client-visible per help page; estimates can be saved as templates (www.paypal.com)	PayPal estimate help	Preview one estimate
Payment receipts and notification emails	Receipt email, transaction screens	Unknown; only the sender is documented (developer.paypal.com)	PayPal developer docs	Do not assume; test with a real small payment or ask PayPal
Public enterprise register	Registraire des entreprises	Public by design for declared addresses (www.quebec.ca)	Quebec.ca	Check the register entry separately

Rows marked unknown are places where public help text does not state the behavior, so a seller cannot responsibly infer it. A seller who edits one row and assumes the others follow is relying on an unstated mechanism; the audit later in this report exists to close those rows.

Following One Address Through PayPal's Documented Surfaces

Step one: the profile

PayPal Canada's address help directs users to the Settings page and its Addresses section, where an address can be added, edited or removed, with equivalent steps in the app (www.paypal.com). A separate help article lists phone number, email address, street address and language setting as items editable under account settings (www.paypal.com). Two constraints on that page matter to freelancers: an account must keep at least one address, with a PO Box not to be used as the primary address, and an address linked to a card should first be updated with the card issuer.

The same page advises entering the physical address first and leaving off the PO Box when a form has too few lines, and says PayPal may mail the account holder at the address from time to time. Because PayPal may mail profile addresses, the profile address must remain reachable even when a different client-facing address is shown.

Step two: invoice business information

PayPal's two-step instruction is explicit: to add a new address, email or phone number to invoices, update the PayPal profile settings, then return to Invoicing and update the business information shown on invoices. The help page links to a business-information settings page for this purpose. In practice this means the invoice block is not a free-text box detached from the account; it is described as being fed by the profile first.

What the documentation does not say is whether the Canadian invoice screen lets a seller leave the address out, choose among several profile addresses, or type a different one. The developer schema marks the address optional and lets the phone be hidden, but the retrieved Canadian help page does not describe a toggle for address display. Treat address suppression as unverified and do not promise it to a client or colleague.

Step three: saved templates

The help page says sellers can create templates "with customized item details, terms and conditions, notes, business info, and other options", and that on desktop a seller can save a new template from an invoice using the arrow on the Send button. PayPal's developer documentation states that a template stores reusable details such as business information (developer.paypal.com) and that an account can hold up to 50 templates (developer.paypal.com). Its template schema lists the invoicer block, with name, address, email, phone, logo URL and tax ID (developer.paypal.com).

A freelancer with several templates (hourly, retainer, project) has several places where an old address can persist. The display rules documented for templates cover line-item and charge fields such as the per-item discount field (developer.paypal.com), not the invoicer address, so the developer documentation gives no support for the idea that a template can hide the address through a display rule. Whether a template picks up a changed profile address automatically is not stated in the pages opened, which is why every template is inspected individually in the audit.

One developer-side limit also matters for anyone using the interface programmatically: template updates through the API do not support partial updates and need the complete template object. That is a reason not to script address changes casually.

Step four: estimates, desktop and mobile

PayPal says business information appears on estimates as well as invoices, and that estimates can be saved as templates. Invoices can be created, sent and managed on both desktop and mobile (www.paypal.com), and quick invoices from mobile include the seller's default business information (www.paypal.com). A default block thus exists apart from any template, so compare desktop and mobile output rather than assume they match.

Other surfaces: do not generalize

Payment receipts, statement descriptors and transaction screens are different surfaces. The only receipt-related fact opened is from PayPal's developer documentation on custom invoice email domains: payment receipts and merchant notifications continue to use the default PayPal sender (developer.paypal.com). Nothing opened says what contact address a receipt shows, so this report makes no claim about receipts and recommends checking them separately.

Business-Address Options and Legitimate Use

What "truthful" means for a client-facing address

A client-facing address is voluntary in the sense that no document opened requires a seller to print a street address on every invoice. It is not voluntary in the sense of being free-form. The address shown must be one the seller is entitled to use, must be accurate, and must not obscure who the seller is or where the business actually operates. The User Agreement's prohibition on false or misleading information supports that reading, and Revenu Québec's invoice table, discussed below, shows that the supplier's identity (name or business name) is the legally significant field.

Government sources already distinguish address types in ordinary tax and registry practice. The Canada Revenue Agency says a business's mailing address can differ from its physical address, for example mail delivered to a home or an accountant (www.canada.ca), while the physical address is where day-to-day activities take place (www.canada.ca). It also requires separate notice when books and records are kept somewhere other than the physical address (www.canada.ca). Accounting software reflects the same split: QuickBooks distinguishes the address where a company is physically located (quickbooks.intuit.com), an address used for communicating with customers (quickbooks.intuit.com), and an address used when filing tax forms (quickbooks.intuit.com).

The Quebec register and the professional address

In Quebec, the register of enterprises treats a natural person's domicile and professional addresses differently. The Registraire says new transparency obligations have applied since 31 March 2023 (www.quebec.ca). It defines a natural person's professional address as the main place of work or business (www.quebec.ca), says a person who does not want the domicile published can declare a professional address if they have one (www.quebec.ca), and says only one professional address can be declared per person (www.quebec.ca). It also states that a PO box cannot serve as a professional address (www.quebec.ca), and that if a required update is not made the domicile address will be published.

Three points follow from the Registraire's text:

- Domicile versus professional address: a natural person declares a domicile and may add one professional address.
- No PO box: a postal box does not qualify as a professional address.
- Keep it current: an out-of-date professional address can lead to publication of the domicile.

The register concerns what is published about the enterprise; a PayPal invoice is a separate document. Still, the register's definition is a useful conservative benchmark: a professional address is a real place of work or business, and a mailbox that is not the owner's place of work is not described that way. Whether a specific mail-service address qualifies for a given purpose is a question for the Registraire or an adviser.

Options compared

Table 2 lists address options a Montreal freelancer might place in the client-facing block. It states what each is and which documented considerations apply. No price is given for any private service, because no executed terms were reviewed.

Table 2. Client-facing address options and documented considerations (as of 26 November 2026)

Option	What it is	Documented considerations	Use on an invoice
Own residence	The owner's home address	A Government of Canada small-business page (not Quebec-specific) lists "legal and health restrictions" as a consideration if the business is in an apartment or house (sbs-spe.feddevontario.canada.ca), and advises not compromising professionalism in a less formal environment (sbs-spe.feddevontario.canada.ca)	Truthful and always available; a privacy trade-off the owner decides
Desk or private office at a coworking space	A real place of work	Fits the Registraire's idea of a place of work; check the membership terms for address use	Suitable where the owner actually works there
Virtual office or business-address service (for example, the publisher, 2727coworking.com in Montreal)	A street address with mail handling, sometimes with meeting-room access	Terms differ by provider; Wise, for its own business accounts, says a trading address cannot be a mail forwarding or receiving service (wise.com) and that it cannot accept virtual or temporary addresses when editing a verified account (www.wise.com); acceptance by PayPal for any category is not documented in the pages opened	Possible as a contact address if the owner is entitled to it; not a substitute for the residence or for unproven operations. Request the executed terms and a written answer from PayPal before relying on it
Canada Post PO box	A rented postal box	Small box in urban-core areas is listed at $214 per year, with $192 for urban non-core and rural tables (www.canadapost-postescanada.ca); the Registraire says a PO box is not a professional address; PayPal says a PO Box should not be a primary address	Not suitable as the primary business address
Accountant or lawyer c/o address	A third party's office used for mail	The CRA gives an accountant as a mailing-address example (www.canada.ca)	Only with the third party's written permission

The table shows that "virtual address" is a category, not a guarantee, and no document opened lets any provider promise acceptance by a payment platform. Wise, for example, says its trading address can be a co-working space (wise.com) but not a mail forwarding or receiving service, which shows how two plausible-sounding categories can be treated differently by one provider. That describes Wise's own process, not PayPal's, and illustrates only that category rules differ between platforms.

Professional branding is not account acceptance

Changing the client-facing block does not change what a provider needs for its own verification. Stripe's documentation separates the two: public business details such as a support email, phone number and address are shown to customers (docs.stripe.com), while its verification page says it must verify that account holders operate from the business addresses they provide (support.stripe.com), and its Canadian FAQ requires a valid physical Canadian address (support.stripe.com). PayPal's pages opened make no equivalent statement, so keep the two layers consistent and truthful, and ask PayPal when unsure. A professional address on an invoice is branding and contact, not a verification strategy.

Quebec Document Duties That an Address Choice Does Not Change

What the tax table actually says

Revenu Québec states that no special invoices or rules are imposed under the GST/HST and QST systems, except for restaurants and taxi operators (www.revenuquebec.ca). Separately, a registrant's purchase invoices and supporting documents must provide specific information to justify input tax credits (ITCs, for GST) and input tax refunds (ITRs, for QST) (www.revenuquebec.ca), and a supplier must provide that information in writing on request (www.revenuquebec.ca). The federal side is consistent: the CRA says suppliers have to provide specific information on invoices, receipts, contracts or other business papers (www.canada.ca).

The information varies by total value including taxes. Revenu Québec's table lists the supplier's name or business name in every band, the supplier's GST and QST registration numbers from $100 up, and, at $500 or more, the purchaser's name and the terms of payment. The table has an invoice date row for all bands. The federal regulation likewise requires the supplier's name or the name under which it does business (laws-lois.justice.gc.ca). In summary form, the fields in Revenu Québec's and the CRA's tables are as follows. They describe what a registrant customer needs on purchase documents to justify input tax credits and refunds, which the supplier must provide in writing on request:

- Under $100: supplier name, invoice date, total amount, plus the tax amount (QST only) and the description of the property or service (QST only).
- $100 to $499.99: the same, plus the supplier's GST and QST registration numbers; the tax amount applies to both taxes, and the description is still required for QST only.
- $500 or more: all of the above plus the purchaser's name, the terms of payment, and a description required for both taxes.

Notably, neither table lists the supplier's street address as a required field. That is an observation about these two tables, not a general statement that no Quebec document ever needs an address.

The Quebec tax authority also says registers and supporting documents must be kept at the registrant's establishment or residence, or another place it designates (www.revenuquebec.ca), for six years after the end of the last year to which they apply (www.revenuquebec.ca), and the CRA's record-keeping publication states a six-year retention period as well (www.canada.ca). Those duties concern where records are kept, not which address a client sees on an invoice.

Small suppliers are a further wrinkle. A supplier whose taxable supplies stay at or below $30,000 is not required to register for or collect GST/HST and QST (www.revenuquebec.ca), yet may choose to register (www.revenuquebec.ca). A freelancer below the threshold who has not registered would not show registration numbers at all, so the checklist later asks the owner to confirm status with an accountant rather than copy a template.

Language

The Charter of the French language provides that invoices, receipts, acquittances and similar documents must be drawn up in French (www.legisquebec.gouv.qc.ca), and that a document cannot be sent in another language if the French version is not available to the recipient on terms at least as favourable (www.legisquebec.gouv.qc.ca). Quebec.ca summarizes the business obligation as drafting in French the contracts, invoices, receipts and other documents intended for consumers (www.quebec.ca). The Charter also requires an enterprise name to be in French (www.legisquebec.gouv.qc.ca). These rules shape the invoice's wording and the name shown, not the address, but they are the reason a PayPal invoice template should be reviewed in the language the client will read. PayPal notes that a customer without a PayPal account receives the invoice and notification email in the language of the seller's account unless the seller specifies another.

Consumers versus businesses

Quebec's Consumer Protection Act applies to contracts between a consumer and a merchant in the course of the merchant's business (www.legisquebec.gouv.qc.ca), and defines a consumer as a natural person, excluding a merchant who obtains goods or services for business purposes (www.legisquebec.gouv.qc.ca). Most freelancers invoice businesses, but some serve individuals. The Act has address-related requirements for certain contract types, for example itinerant-merchant contracts, which refer to the address of the merchant's principal establishment in Quebec (www.legisquebec.gouv.qc.ca). Those rules are contract-specific, so no universal invoice-address rule can be derived from it; a freelancer who sells to consumers should ask an adviser.

Privacy context

The federal personal-information law defines business contact information to include examples such as work address and work telephone number (laws-lois.justice.gc.ca), and the Privacy Commissioner's interpretation bulletin says that law does not apply to an organization in respect of the business contact information of an individual (www.priv.gc.ca). That is federal context only; Quebec has its own private-sector statute, which this report does not interpret. The practical point is the one the Quebec registry already makes: a work address and a home address are different things, and which one clients see is a deliberate privacy decision.

Implementation Guidance: The Client-View Audit

The audit follows the order PayPal documents (profile, then invoice information), adds a saved-template check, and ends with a written record. It is a checklist, not a statement that a test was run.

Before changing anything

- Inventory the profile. List every address in the Settings Addresses section and note which is primary.
- Leave identity facts alone. Do not edit anything to influence invoice output while a verification step is open.
- Decide the address. Pick one truthful contact address with written permission to use it. Confirm that the residence remains accurate in the profile, since PayPal requires current contact information.

- Save evidence. Take redacted screenshots of the current invoice settings and of each template before editing.

Making the change

- Update the profile first if the address, email or phone must change.
- Return to Invoicing and update the business information on invoices.
- Update each saved template individually, because inheritance is not documented. Remember templates can store business information.
- Check the default business block used by quick mobile invoices.

Preview before any client sees it

- Create one new invoice and one new estimate and view the client preview on desktop. Use a test recipient you control and delete or void the document according to PayPal's own steps.
- Repeat on mobile with a quick invoice, since mobile uses the default business information.
- Open each saved template and compare its displayed block with the new default.
- Check the email the recipient receives, including its language.
- Check a payment receipt separately, or mark it unknown.
- Compare against the legal fields: supplier name, registration numbers from $100 up where registered, purchaser name and terms from $500, and French wording.

Table 3 is a log to complete for each template and surface. The rows shown are (Hypothetical Example) entries to show the format, not observations.

Table 3. Template audit log (blank form with hypothetical entries)

Template	Invoice or estimate	Desktop or mobile	Contact address displayed	Matches approved address	Audit date
(Hypothetical Example) Hourly	Invoice	Desktop	Approved office address	Yes	Record the date
(Hypothetical Example) Retainer	Invoice	Mobile	Old address still shown	No, edit the template	Record the date
(Hypothetical Example) Quote	Estimate	Desktop	Approved office address	Yes	Record the date
(Your template)

A rarely used template is exactly where an old address survives, so the 50-template ceiling is a reminder to delete unused templates rather than audit them forever.

When to ask PayPal in writing

Ask for a written answer, and keep it, in four situations:

- No control: the invoice screen offers no way to omit or change an address.

- Stale template: a template keeps showing an old address after the update.
- Unclear category: the owner wants a mail-service or virtual address and cannot find PayPal's stated rule for that category.
- Verification overlap: an address change might touch identity verification.

The identity page says PayPal aims to review documents within 48 hours but that it may take longer, and the User Agreement says holders agree to cooperate with reasonable requests for documentation. Record the reference number and date of any reply in the change log.

Cost worksheet

The cost of choosing a professional address is arithmetic on quoted figures, not a forecast. Use this form with your own numbers:

- Annual address cost (A): the quoted annual subscription for the professional address, taken from an executed or written quote.
- Maintenance time (T): hours per year spent updating templates, previews and logs.
- Hourly cost (H): the owner's own valuation of an hour.
- Optional extras (E): items such as mail scanning or meeting-room time, listed separately and not assumed.
- Total annual cost = A + (T × H), with E reported on its own line.

No risk-reduction estimate, privacy score or savings figure is offered, because none was sourced.

Data Analysis and Evidence

This report is not a survey; its quantitative core is a set of verified thresholds and reference figures from official sources. None measures demand or outcomes.

Tax-document thresholds

The Revenu Québec table has three value bands based on the total value of the sales including taxes: less than $100, $100 to $499.99, and $500 or more (www.revenuquebec.ca). The supplier's name or business name is needed in all three bands, the supplier's registration numbers from $100 (www.revenuquebec.ca), and the purchaser's name and terms of payment from $500 (www.revenuquebec.ca). The CRA uses the same bands in its supporting-document chart (www.canada.ca). The small-supplier threshold of $30,000 and the six-year retention period complete the set (www.revenuquebec.ca).

PayPal documentation parameters

PayPal's developer documentation sets a ceiling of 50 templates per merchant account (developer.paypal.com). The template page shows a last-updated date of September 3, 2026 (developer.paypal.com), and the Canadian User Agreement page shows June 10, 2026 (www.paypal.com). The invoicing and identity help pages show no visible modification date, so they are identified by retrieval date, 26 November 2026. PayPal aims to review identity documents within 48 hours but warns it may take longer (www.paypal.com).

Address-service reference prices

The postal-box pages of Canada Post's consumer price guide, dated January 1, 2026 (other pages of the same PDF carry different effective dates), list the small postal box at $214 per year in urban-core areas and $192 in the urban non-core and rural tables (www.canadapost-postescanada.ca); the guide says to consult the local post office for the applicable table, and its urban-core list includes the H1A to H9W range covering Montreal postal codes beginning with H. This is only a published reference for a postal box, which the Registraire and PayPal both treat as unsuitable for a primary business address (www.quebec.ca) (www.paypal.com). It is not a virtual-office price, and none is stated in this report.

The freelancer population

Statistics Canada reports that self-employed workers made up 13.2% of the employed population in 2023 (www150.statcan.gc.ca). It also reports that most self-employed people had no partners (79.1%) or premises dedicated to their business activity (69.0%) (www150.statcan.gc.ca), and that close to half (46.2%) ran unincorporated businesses (www150.statcan.gc.ca). These are national figures, not Quebec figures, and the survey does not measure PayPal use, invoice practices or address display; they are only a proxy suggesting that the home is a common workplace.

Implications and Future Directions

For freelancers, the main implication is procedural. The client-facing address is a deliberate, documented, reversible choice, and a short audit prevents the common failure mode of an old address persisting in a rarely used template. Because documentation does not settle template inheritance or address suppression, the owner should treat those as open questions and record the answer found on their own account.

For accountants and advisers, the checklist offers a shared language. Revenu Québec's and the CRA's supporting-document tables concern names, dates, amounts, registration numbers and terms (www.canada.ca); an adviser can use the audit log to confirm those fields appear while a separate conversation covers address privacy. Software comparisons show the pattern is common: Wave says editing business information changes what a customer sees on past and future invoices (support.waveapps.com), FreshBooks says the profile address appears on all invoices, estimates and proposals (support.freshbooks.com), and Zoho Invoice lets the user choose whether an address change applies to existing as well as future transactions (www.zoho.com). PayPal's pages opened do not state an equivalent rule for templates, which is the clearest gap in public documentation.

Open items to recheck. Repeat the audit after any PayPal interface update, address change, template change, change of GST and QST registration status, or change to the enterprise register entry. Federal corporations face a parallel discipline: a corporation must always have a registered office in the province specified in its articles (laws.justice.gc.ca), the address cannot be a post office box (ic.gc.ca), and it is public even if residential (ic.gc.ca). Incorporated freelancers should therefore check that the client-facing address, the corporate registry address and the tax-office record tell a consistent story, and should keep in mind the CRA's request to be told of changes in any of the business addresses (www.canada.ca).

This report summarizes opened public documentation and is not legal, tax or accounting advice; questions about invoice content for a specific client type, French-language compliance, or what may be declared to the Registraire belong with a Quebec accountant or lawyer.

Frequently Asked Questions (FAQs)

Does a PayPal invoice show the owner's home address?

Documentation does not say that it will or will not. PayPal says business information, including business address, appears at the top of invoices and estimates, and that new address details must be added in the profile before the invoice information is updated. If the profile holds a home address, the safe assumption is that it could be shown until a preview proves otherwise.

How is the business address on a PayPal invoice changed?

Update the address, email or phone in the PayPal profile settings, then return to PayPal Invoicing and update the business information on invoices. Then inspect saved templates one by one.

Can I hide the address entirely?

Not established. The developer schema lets the invoicer hide the phone number but the documented template display rules cover line-item and charge fields. Ask PayPal in writing before promising anyone that an address can be suppressed.

How does a PayPal business account address change work?

PayPal's address help describes adding, editing and removing addresses in the Settings Addresses section and in the app. The account must keep at least one address, and a PO Box should not be primary. The pages opened say nothing about whether a change triggers account review, so contact PayPal if the account is in a verification step.

What must a Quebec invoice include?

There is no single Quebec invoice format for tax purposes (www.revenuquebec.ca), but a registrant's supporting documents must carry specified fields by value band (www.revenuquebec.ca), and consumer-facing invoices must be in French (www.quebec.ca). See the tax and language sections above, and consult an adviser for sector-specific rules.

Can I use a virtual office address on an invoice?

Possibly, as a contact address, if the owner is entitled to use it and it is truthful. It cannot replace the owner's residence or describe operations that do not exist, and acceptance by PayPal is not documented for any address category in the pages opened. For the Quebec register, a professional address means the main place of work or business.

Conclusion

PayPal invoices expose a seller-configured contact block that is distinct from private verification data, and the documented way to change it is profile first, invoice business information second. What remains undocumented in the pages opened is exactly what a freelancer needs to know before sending a client document: whether saved templates inherit a changed address, whether an address can be omitted, and how receipts behave. The audit turns those unknowns into a preview-and-record routine.

The address a client sees should be truthful, permitted and consistent with the owner's other records. A professional address can be a sound choice for contact and privacy, but it is not a replacement for the owner's residence in the Quebec register, not a way around tax-document fields, and not a guarantee of account acceptance. Keep the change log, and repeat the audit after any interface or address change. Disclosure: the publisher, 2727coworking.com, is noted near the start of this article.
